A: You can download this: This is the link for it, but if you go to: You'll find how to obtain it! Note: You can't access to have your license key directly to download the operating system, it has to be installed directly on your computer, so if you have a Mac you can't download it, you have to buy it, or read the next question. The Dixie Chicks returned to SXSW after announcing a nationwide ban from touring and recording in 2003. They also recorded a new album, Home, during this hiatus. It's both stronger and more direct than any of their previous releases. But in the process they have broken more than a few hearts. There was a time when the Dixie Chicks were able to make people happy: the era of Free Radio, when they'd go into a little country bar and sing for a few hours without being asked to. But they ended up alienating most of the audience over a couple of songs. For the "Angry, White Feminists" crowd. Yes, they're about (gasp!) women's rights, but do they have to be so angry and angry? As Ralph Stanley, the "King Of The Delta Blues", once put it, "You don't go and cause trouble when you're goin' to a party." He was talking about the protest song, but it applies just as well to the Chicks, who have shown a willingness to get some unpleasant truths out of the way. I don't love all of Home (the dueling versions of "Not Ready to Make Nice" are slightly overwrought), but I appreciate it for what it is. It's a statement that says, "Screw you, if you don't like what we're saying, we'll still sing it." In the years since 2003, the women have taken to keeping their mouths shut about their politics, and have become generally uncritically beloved. Every time the Chicks say something, the country echo chamber pretty much provides a series of paragraphs that say, "Well, she's right!" I'm not saying that the Chicks are a bad thing (they're not), but when they win, they feel like someone who went through a lot and was now, finally 570a2141b
